Shortly after arriving there, their bravery, intrepidity and presence of mind were put to a test which would have satisfied many an old hunter. An antelope hunt, as a matter of course, undertaken on horseback, led the couple and their friends and followers, after a few hours' ride, to a genuine tropical forest; from a marshy swamp, in its lower part assuming the proportions of a small lake, gigantic palm trees lifted their heads and invited the company to rest in their shade. The horses were unsaddled and given in charge of their grooms and some Sondanese.

Lady Esmore, on hearing that the forest harbored every sort of game, became restless, and proposed to explore the same, little minding the difficulties of the advance. The party soon reached a sort of creek, ahaded by the thick foliage of enormous syca ; ores. At their approach the ungainly form of a rhinoceros rose before them, and forcing its passage through the underwood and reeds disappeared from sight, much to the lady's annoyance, While looking disappointedly after the colossal pachyderm, she felt a light touch on her arm, and on turning round saw one of the Soudanese servants wistfully pointing to the leafy roof of a sycamore. On glancing upward, she espied the ferociously glittering eyes of a leopard, crouching on a branch of the tree, and evidenly in wait for some game coming to quench its thirst in the creek below. No sooner had she realized her position than she heard the report of Lord Esmore's gun and saw the leopard fall bleeding to the ground; a secoud shot stretched him apparently dead, within a few feet of her. One of the Sondauese ran toward the leopard in order to be the first to offer the animal's beautiful. agonized beast and thrown down. ..... INDIAN SUPERSTITION.

A Pinte squaw, suspected by her tribe of peing a witch, was killed in the Harmony Mountains, near Winnemucca, Nevada, one day recently. Many of the Indians are very reticent with r gard to the matter, but one of the red Cotton Mathers made a statement that the woman had caused the death of several braves by casting upon them the evil eye, and that a party of the avengers had taken her to the grave of one of her victim, and there executed her in the most approved style. The murderers thought they were performing a religious duty.
